CELEBRATING EARTH DAY
CREATING A LOVE OF NATURE FOR CHILDREN

On April 22 people around the globe will celebrate Earth Day by increasing awareness of recycling programs, encouraging energy efficiency, and hosting programs to get more people involved in taking care of our planet.

Days like this are a good reminder for adults. They encourage us to think about the things we do on a daily basis and demand that we look at how we’re treating the Earth. Often, we get so caught up in the daily grind that we don’t stop and think this way.

For example, recently I was washing a sink-full of my twin boys’ bottles and realized half-way through that I left the water running (when I could have shut it off between scrubbing all the individual pieces). Yeah, sure, water is cheap and plentiful here in the Midwest, but somewhere along the line I forgot the lessons my grade school teachers had taught about conservation of natural resources.

I vividly remember sitting in class and listening to my teacher talk about how we should turn the water off while brushing our teeth in order to conserve water (which I still do), but I wasn’t applying that lesson to my adult life of washing baby bottles. What else am I doing that I should be better about?

For many of us, our love of nature and feelings of responsibility to the Earth were formed at an early age, so I love that PBS KIDS celebrates Earth Month with a slate of eco-centered programs and activities designed to inspire kids to go outside and enjoy nature. They call it Explore the Outdoors.

For 2019 Explore the Outdoors includes crafts and activities that teach kids about nature, and classroom resources that continue the conversation about animals, habitats and sustainability. Additionally, there’s a week of new outdoor adventures from shows like Ready Jet Go., Nature Cat, and Wild Kratts!

Locally, WQPT will air episodes of Let’s Explore with Mr. Scott between nature shows. It’s designed to encourage children to ask questions, use materials in different ways, and provide parents free or inexpensive ideas to interact with their children.

This month features regional and national PBS KIDS programs which intend to create and reinforce a love of nature in our children. Who knows… perhaps 30 years from now a grown man—who watched an episode of Nature Cat as a child—will stop and think and make a simple change that makes the Earth a little “greener.”
